

Since mass communication through every medium, there have been concerns over "objectionable" content. There are no forced audiences that must submit to listen, view or read things that they deem distasteful. Quite simply, if one finds something objectionable, simply do not consume the item offered. We cannot nor should not legislate good taste as I would argue that each individual would assign a vast array of qualifiers on defining good taste. I know my definition and as much as I find some films a bit too graphic for my tastes, I would not impose my standards on others. I'm content to close my eyes, turn my head, close a book, walk away if something offends me. Let's not be too hasty in trying to set standards that a one size fits all approach will cure all concerns.